Tips to Prevent Academic Dishonesty

General Preventive Steps

- Discuss the honor code with your students: Research by the Center for Academic Integrity has determined that faculty engagement with students is one of the most significant steps to reduce cheating. At the start of the semester and before each important assignment or exam, discuss the honor code with students and your mutual obligations under it (i.e., they should not cheat, and you must report honor code violations). In addition to indicating the possible sanctions (including suspension from school) that attach to violations, explain the need for trust and integrity in course work – and real life. Explain that we are a community of scholars who place tremendous value on recognizing the work of others (through proper citation).

- Enlist student support in maintaining the Honor Code: The honor code is largely student-administered. Encourage students both to discourage cheating by colleagues and to share with you, on a confidential basis if desired, reports of cheating. We have no formal requirement that students report their classmates, but that does not mean students should ignore their moral obligations.

- Set clear standards for assignments and grading: When handing out assignments, try to remove any ambiguity regarding whether you permit students to work together on assignments and whether students may use outside sources. Explicit instructions in your syllabus and interpretations—especially those that apply uniquely to any specific circumstances in your class can avoid unnecessary arguments later on questions (the Writing Center provides clear guidelines regarding what does and does not constitute plagiarism, and they have online exercises for students to improve their competency). Encourage students to ask for clarification of any point of confusion.

- Require students to sign an honor statement: Require students to include and sign an “honor statement” on all graded work. For example: “On my honor, I have neither given nor received unauthorized assistance on this assignment [exam].”

- Report violations: The honor code is only as effective as your willingness to support it through formal reporting. Doing so permits us to respond consistently and fairly and reduces the chance of recidivism, as we are able to maintain accurate and complete records and can know when a student’s act is an isolated one.

Preparing and Monitoring Exams (Especially for Large Sections of Courses)

- Use 2-4 versions of the test with questions in different sequences. Although you have no obligation whatsoever to announce this to your class, consider whether you wish to do so.

- Put essay questions, which are harder to copy, on the top of exams. Place multiple choice and true/false questions at the bottom of the page.

- Use alternate seating, if available. If not, consider reserving two rooms for an exam so as to space students out more.

- Before the exam begins, request that all papers be placed in backpacks or other places where students cannot see them during the exam.
• Prohibit the use of cell phones, PDA’s, or iPods/iPads during the exam (or, at a minimum, require that they be turned completely off).
• You are permitted to have students place all electronic devices at the end of their row or securely in their bags/backpacks. Instruct them to power down their phones.
• Note that students are increasingly using text messaging as a form of cheating on exams.
• Students can send and receive messages on their cell phones in less than 20 seconds! Many know how to type messages on their phones without even looking at them.

• If you use bluebooks, you should consider several alternatives to avoid students bringing in unauthorized material:
  1. Ask students to turn their blank bluebooks in to you before the exam starts. Examine them and redistribute them at the start of the exam.
  2. Ask students to begin writing on a certain page (other than page 1) in their bluebooks (prevents students from using pre-filled books).
  3. Ask students to begin writing on a line other than the top line in their bluebooks.

• Where students are permitted to use computers to type their exams, prohibit students from connecting to the network during the exam (have them turn off wifi). State in writing on the exams that students must open a new file and not close it until the end of the exam.

• Be present during the exam (proctoring is permitted and recommended) and be conspicuous. Look for wandering eyes or unauthorized talking. In large classes, walk around the classroom at random times during the exam. Do not allow students to wear hats during the exam, as they prevent you from seeing the student’s eyes.

• Recently we have heard from faculty members concerned about using the bathrooms as a place to store textbooks, notes, etc. If this is a concern for you, we recommend inspecting the bathrooms after distributing the exams and watching for excessive bathroom breaks.

• Collect exams from students while still seated rather than have them hand exams in at the end of the period. Note: We have had two cases in recent years of students taking another’s test from the stack of completed exams, copying answers, and then handing their test in.

• If you have suspicions that someone may be a “ringer,” ask him or her for identification during the exam. If the students refuses or cannot provide an ID, confiscate the exam and write a detailed description of the person taking the exam.

• Have a consistent “loss-proof” method of transporting papers between class, office and home (e.g., locked briefcase). Keep your office and desk locked.

• Number each exam and put each student’s name on his or her exam. Count exams as students hand them in.

Post-Exam Steps

• Have the same person grade all answers to the same question(s).
• Look for common patterns in the answers to exam questions.
• Mark wrong answers or blank spaces in ink with an “X” or slash mark.
• Scan copies of the graded exams to keep in your records—students have, on occasion, changed answers and requested a regrade, claiming the instructor erred in grading.
• Have one person review all requests for re-grades.
• Update exams on reserve so that you do not inadvertently repeat previously asked exam questions.
